

A photosensitive device relates to radio electronics, in particular to computation engineering and alarm systems. The device comprises two electrodes with a light-sensitive layer by way of dielectric, semiconductor or mix of these materials that change dielectric capacitivity under optical exposure. The technical result is increase in sensitivity to changing light flux intensity in wider band, operation speed and sensitivity to low intensity light fluxes.