

The invention relates to inorganic particles having the particular property of being spontaneously individualised, both in the dry state in the form of a powder and when they are dispersed in a matrix. The invention also relates to a method for producing said particles, and to the materials produced by including said particles in matrices.