

A method for separation of solid materials relates to the area of enrichment of mixtures. This method consists in loading of initial material with liquid on to the working surface and separation of the pulp by vibration. To improve the quality of enrichment, concentration of solid material in the pulp is kept at the level between 100 and 700 g/l of liquid and as working surface perforated elastic material is used.