

A method for dismantling a ship for metal and manufacturing articles of it includes cutting of the hull, its edges, deck plates, partitions, compartments, double board and bottom into modules and sections which quantity is multiple to quantity of semi-finished items of design products. From cut off units, modules and plates with addition of materials are formed such products as compartments and/or capacities of pontoons with hatch and closing, equipped with elements of fastening and control of filling up and drain of water. From cut off modules in the form of metal plates are additionally made plates with elements of fastening and/or capacities, for example, for water or fuel, or loose material with hatch and closing.