

A method for control of the state of rail points and recording of premature wear in the area of switch rails provides for setting of maximum signal level, which corresponds to the gap length between switch point and stock rail at permissible wear of point. The invention relates to the railroad automatic equipment and can be used for control of the state of points and recording of their premature wear.