

A method for determining the concentration of particles of the dust in the gaseous environments provides for additional recording of the signals proportional to the intensity of initial luminous flux and luminous flux scattered by optical element. The invention relates to electrical removal of dust from gases and can be used in control systems of electrofilters and other dust-collecting installations.