

The device for double-pole automatic control in the alternating-current circuit comprises the first overvoltage limiter, the first pulse shaper and a main amplifier. The invention relates to automation and electrical engineering and can be used in implementation of automation devices realizing periodical turning the power on and off with double-pole load time delay in alternating-current circuits.