

The invention relates to high pressures technique and can be used in manufacturing processes as means for obtaining single and polycrystalline superhard materials of different purpose, and also at physical chemistry studies at high thermodynamic parameters. A container contains a housing made from material on the basis of limestone and which has a central opening for positioning the reaction charge.