

The invention relates to the device assisting in support and movement of the weak patients in surgical and traumatological departments. The device contains two tubular U-shaped supports with the upper handles for the hands and the bars inside, the telescopic appliances with the lockers adjusting the height of the supports connected on hinges with the rigid frame in the front, and the stopper mechanisms restricting the turn of the supports.