

The massage device for preventing and treating the prostatitis relates to medicine, in particular to the devices for massaging the separate areas of human body. The device contains the arched tubular casing with two handles. One handle is fixed while the other is movable and attached with the vibrator mounted in the canal of the casing. The vibrator is designed as the eccentric roller leaned onto the bottom of the canal and set in rotary motion thereby. The massage device is placed under the perineum, and the vibrating massage is performed by displacing the movable handle.