

A method for preparation of fried food products containing starch provides for heat treatment, during which starch is gelled, frying up to half-readiness, cooling and optional bringing to readiness. Within the period between heat treatment and drying the product surface is subjected to mechanical processing under conditions of pressure suppression and high temperature.