

A method for assessing the level of anthropogenic digression of steppe ecosystems using bryophytic species comprises the visual analysis and the assessment of the state of plants according to the specific scale based on findings of optical microscopy and photography. Bryophyta and Marchantiophyta species of the specified steppe associations are used as indicator species. The level of anthropogenic digression of steppe ecosystems is calculated according to the five-link scale.