

An aspiration conduit of variable length consists of hollow elements located coaxially. The elements are made in the form of series-connected conduits located one in another. Each internal conduit has the capability of alternate motion.