

A method of machining components with variable section allowance, at which the frequency of rotation of component gradually changes maintaining the constancy of cutting speed. During working not only the frequency of rotation of component is changed, but also the rate of feed per its revolution according to the law, which ensures the constancy of the cross-sectional area of metal layer being cut off per revolution of the component.