

An electrode consists of a metal shell and a core. Components in the form of fibers or filaments, or tapes, or bunch located along the electrode are used as a core. The core contains wires or tapes of metal and alloy, which content depends on the given properties.