

A hairdressing chair comprises a client's seat, which rotates around its axis, and a leg fixed immovably as regards to the floor. Additionally it is provided with a cover made of durable material and an air blower in such a manner as to allow air supply from the back and the sides of the chair as well as with a mechanism for changing the temperature condition and air supply power built into an armrest.